

Campaigns in Wales under Nero

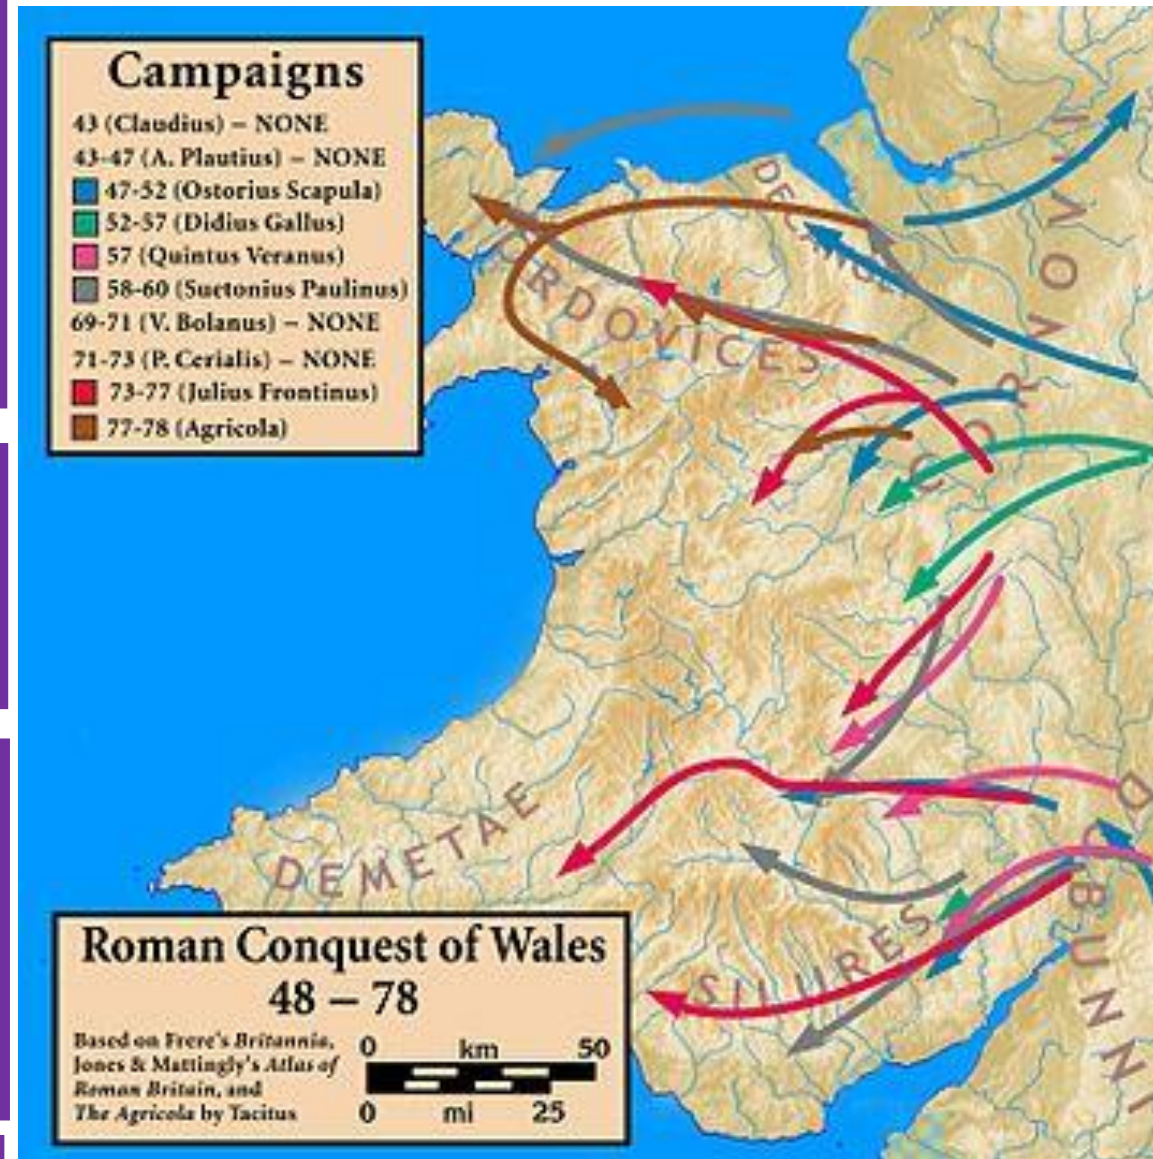

The start of the Welsh invasions would happen when king Caratacus fled from south England to south Wales where the romans followed. He would go to the Silures and after they had been defeated, he then fled away to the north of Wales to become king of the Ordovices, one of two major tribes in Wales at the time. In one battle the tribe would be defeated however they managed to destroy two cohorts of the roman legion.

The next invasion of Wales would happen under Quintus Veranius who was governor of Britannia. In 57ad and his conquest was against the Silures.

After Veranius dies in 58ad Seutonium Paulinus would continue the campaign and it seems Veranius was successful against the Silures as Paulinus heads north against the Ordovices. Where he would then beat them in battle and head onto Anglesey.

The invasion of Anglesey would occur in 60ad as Paulinus would have had to plan out the invasion of the island where the druids lived.

Once on the island Paulinus would win a pitched battle and proceed to kill many of the inhabitants

After the success in Anglesey Paulinus would stay on the island as he garrisoned it until he departed to Londinium due to a large revolt from queen Boudicca of the Iceni tribe.

With the end of the revolt this would be the end of Nero's campaign in Wales as there isn't any more accounts of any battles or events in Wales during the rest of Nero's reign.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Todd M. (2004) A companion to Roman Britain. London: wiley blackwell
- Davies, J. L., & Jones, R. H. (2006). Roman camps in Wales and the Marches. University of Wales Press.
- Tacitus, C., Martin, R. and Woodman, A., 2006. Annals. Cambridge [England]: Cambridge University Press.

living on mona including all the druids and when he killed these druids, he he would perform in a human sacrifice as the druids had performed a ritual to their gods before the romans slaughtered them sacrificing themselves to smite the romans.

