This is an interesting piece of work that reveals a certain degree of individuality in its treatment of material. There is strong evidence of having carefully considered what you consider to be the main problem with D's method, & you present a well sustained, plausible argument to support your conclusion. The idea that D's bases too much of what he feels to be the case is an interesting one. I think, in terms of the cogito, more by way of counter-argument is needed, although (as you say in the endnotes) I realise you are up against a word limit. Overall, this is a very good, well written piece of work.
