

The Imitation Game

TEAM WORK

Film is based on Alan Turing cracking the Enigma Machine that was built by the Germans during the Second world war.

Team of 6 implemented by the military on a top secret mission to crack the German daily codes.

Had to work collaboratively in order to meet the daily deadlines.

Having collaboratively worked I can relate more to Alan Turing in the film as I too struggled to work as a team and get my ideas across in a way for everyone to understand my way of thinking.

It would take over 600 years to break the code with every single person on the planet attempting to get through all possible combinations. (The Axiom - Hannah Furness, Sept 2021)

The team of 6 had to work together to produce a machine that was capable of breaking the German codes. Similar to the TV & Film industry, they all had to use their own individual ways of thinking and efficiently work together in order to produce something that worked.

Looking at the ethics throughout this film and his life, he had to hide his identity. Even after his achievements of cracking the Enigma machine and inevitably winning us the war, he was hidden from the world for being his true self and only recently pardoned.

I strongly believe that it was way too late before he was pardoned, he should have been declared a hero the second he won us the war.