Example	Help or authorship
You ask ChatGPT to write a paragraph about person-centred care. You change a few words and put it into your assignment.	False Authorship The main writing and ideas have been produced for you. Changing a few words does not make it your own work.
A family member reads your assignment and corrects every sentence to make the writing sound more academic.	False Authorship – too much help The family member is changing your assessed writing. They could point out where something is unclear, but you should make the changes yourself.
A librarian shows you how to search for journal articles about mental health. You choose the articles, read them and write about them yourself.	Appropriate Help The librarian is helping you develop a skill. You are still doing the research, thinking and writing.
A classmate reads your paragraph and says, “I don’t understand this part. Can you explain it more clearly?” You then change the paragraph yourself.	Appropriate Help – Your classmate gives feedback, but you decide what to change and do the writing yourself.
A proofreader points out some spelling mistakes. You check the words and correct the mistakes yourself.	Appropriate Help The proofreader is showing you where there may be a problem. You decide how to correct your own work.
You buy a ‘model answer’ online. You change the words and use the ideas and structure for your own assignment.	False Authorship Paying for the work does not make it yours. Changing some words does not make someone else’s work your own work.
A website gives you an answer to your assignment question. You change some of the words before putting it into your work.	False Authorship Changing a few words is not enough. You need to find reliable sources, understand the information and write about it yourself.
Your tutor explains what the assignment question means and asks questions to help you plan what you need to do.	Appropriate Help Your tutor is helping you understand the task. You still decide what to include and complete the work yourself.
