

Introduction:

My name is Amy Stewart and my student number is 1203461.

Today I am going to talk about children with autism, inclusive practice, 2 strategies and advantages and disadvantages.

I have chosen to use autism because there are many strategies that you can do with the children to help them with things that they struggle with, for example, to overcome the sound of loud sounds and so on. We are also going to talk about early intervention and how this has an impact on the children, families.

Warnock (2005) suggested that the policy has gone too far because vulnerable children with serious problems can be isolated in mainstream schools.

Main Body:

Now I am going to talk about it is a inclusive practice and what the advantages and disadvantages.

Some advantages of giving children with autism at a mainstream school are that we will learn the same curriculum as their peers.

The disadvantages of giving children with autism at a mainstream school, special needs students may have a difficult time to get to know the curriculum, or otherwise bother with the curriculum if they are not sufficiently challenged.

Social Justice and Inclusion In the Early Years

The first strategy I am going to talk about is sensory sensitivity.

You can do different activities for sensory sensitivity. For example you can have them to feel different materials, you can have them to taste different foods to see what they like and what they do not like, you can have them to hear different things and so on

However, no child can learn to read and write until they are already developing. Too often in the world today, we push our students to move on at a level that is not yet ready or ready to think about them.

According to First Discoverers (2011) these senses develop naturally but can be encouraged through sensory education and play.

By doing sensory activities, this can help them to develop their senses and this will be able to help with social skills:

The second strategy I am going to talk about is social stories. I have chosen to talk about social stories because social stories are used to model appropriate social interaction by giving a brief description of a situation using appropriate social care, other perspectives, and a recommended response.

In general, social stories in a sentence format are presented to analyze challenging social situations into fully understandable actions.

Some benefits of social stories are helping them with different things, for example, new experiences - first day at school, getting on an airplane.

Some disadvantages of social stories are how much time it takes to create an individual social story depends on how much time you spend on each of the steps needed to develop the story

However, social stories are not usually a unilateral way of changing the behavior or performance of the person with autism.

And to conclude this presentation, I now have a wider range of information about how each strategie can help children with autism and how they are effective and how they arent so effective on each child
