

The last duchess monologue is about a man that murders his wife, the tone suggests that's he proud of his achievement

These lines suggest he's proud of the murder

"That piece a wonder, now"

"My gift of a nine-hundred-years-old name"

He's happy about what he has done and doesn't show any regret in the monologue or remorse.

The story idea for the group film is trying to escape who you were while keeping hold of who you are.

This could be done in the vein of Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde, as Hyde became part of Jekyll but Hyde was always in Jekyll. We can take inspiration that the bad parts of our main character were buried deep within them

Ideas revolving around a archaeological site could involve treasure but that would be too cliché.

The idea could revolve about a person finding themselves, perhaps they could find the darker side of themselves and they are trying to cope with learning about his darker

The film ghost stories has a narrative structure of showing a character dealing with their morals and having these supernatural events happen to learn to be a better person.

There were some Victorian influences in the film as a morally wrong character dealing with paranormal events were common in Victorian times. Ghost stories could be seen as having influence from Charles Dickens, "A Christmas Carol" as the paranormal entities try to convince a man to change his behaviour.

The characters all did something morally ambiguous, being a bystander of bullying, driving without a licence, making petty comments.

The entities got their revenge on these characters, the ambiguity is also seen in the ending. Where we see a deformed monster push the main character into a hospital bed.

This ending could be taken in a number of ways.

The monster is the cause of why the main character ended up in hospital.

None of the stories happened and it was all due to the main character being in a coma.

I prefer the ending of the monster pushing him into hospital as it would suit the tone of monsters punishing an act better rather than the cliché it was all just a dream ending.