INTRODUCTION

All children and family deserve best start in life . The development they need throughout their childhood is foundation for healthy and happy life,. For households with complex needs, working with many agencies can be challenging, and this research details the outcomes of a university-based study that evaluated the effectiveness of a multi-agency strategy. Distrustful and reliant connections between households and current agencies make it impossible for programs to help the family break out of their dependency. In this presentation, we will explore the case study's children, youths, and families' perspectives of well-being, interventions, and current policies.

WELL BEING

- The programme agreed to pursue an implementation plan for the family, which was critical in ensuring that the family was now re-housed and in assisting one of the children in maintaining a seat at their institution following an impending exclusion.
- The project improved the young people's behaviour, which had previously been a major source of concern for their families and the organisations that worked with them.
- The behaviour of the mother's spouse, as well as the overall well-being of the family, are all taken into account.
- During the evaluation process, a variety of factors are considered, including parental involvement, the children's school attendance and behaviour, and the mother's potential job paths and educational background.

PERCEPTION

- The vast majority of families thought the service they received was excellent and praised the provider's openness and honesty, as well as their willingness to share data with the household.
- As a result of their participation in the initiative, individuals felt more confident in their interactions with agencies.
- Working with the project has resulted in significant improvements in the quality of life for many young people and their families.
- The programme had a positive impact by helping the children understand that there are many others in their lives and by emphasising the most important aspects of their lives.
- Despite her obvious affection for her children, the mother was discovered to have made a number of poor decisions for them. Her participation in the initiative was said to have given her a more positive outlook on the future.
- Mothers hoped that by encouraging their children to stay at home, they would prevent their children from engaging in undesirable activities and behaving inappropriately.

Current policy or interdisciplinary

Taking into account in our case study's identified needs including the features of the family admitted into the program, essential the policies that they worked with were find as allowing response form services connected to the family's health and protection. Children Act (1989) is used to allow youngsters to be secure and productive in their surroundings, taking into account the concerns raised in the case study about domestic violence in the home.

The Human Rights Act (1998) corresponds empowering treatments concerning a family's safety to impair the kid's permission to integrate in education. The Children and Families Act(2014) covers youngsters who are identified as fragile, like children who live in inadequate housing.

Enhancing parenthood for kids has been applied the Children and Social Work act.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, the realizations of this project were to allocate professional fees to this family. Enabling the family to benefit and to access services like Parenting skills training which the mother felt so good about, it gives her more confidence in her life as a single parent.

The household appreciated the projects since they were designed for the parents instead of simply the youngsters. Provides the mother with the chance to build strength, confidence, and conscience, which might indirectly contribute to her style of motherhood, and additional circumstances, such as developing the self-belief to escape from her violent relationship.

As a result, a positive development influence was observed, which leads to benefits for the mother and her children.
