Plagiarism Question 2

You find a useful paragraph while you're reading, and copy it into your essay. You make some small changes to the quotation, replacing some connecting words and swapping one or two words with synonyms. You list the source in the bibliography, but don't give a citation in the text. Will this be counted as plagiarism?

☒ Yes☐ No

Plagiarism Question 3

You find an interesting paragraph while you're researching your topic and copy and paste some of the sentences into your own work. You change the order in which these sentences appear in the original. You don't add any quotation marks because you give a citation in the text and a reference at the end. Is this plagiarism?

☒ Yes☐ No

Plagiarism Question 4

You write a paragraph summarising several sources that you've read. This includes using some key terms from these sources, but you also add words of your own so that it's a coherent paragraph that sounds like your voice. You cite the original sources and add them all to your reference list. Is this plagiarism?

☐ Yes☒ No

Plagiarism Question 5

You write a paragraph based on a text you've read, but you make substantial changes to the language and organisation of the original paragraph. You cite the original source and add it to your reference list. Is this plagiarism?

☐ Yes☒ No

Plagiarism Question 7

Your friend shows you a table of statistics they found for their essay. The data would be useful for your topic too, so you copy the information and add it to your work. You both write about the statistics independently. You forgot to ask where your friend found the statistics, so you don't add a reference. Is this plagiarism?

☒ Yes☐ No

Plagiarism Question 6

You find a paragraph-length quotation that you want to use in your essay. You include the whole section, using quotation marks around the words that aren't yours, and also include a citation and reference at the end of your work. Is this plagiarism?

☐ Yes☒ No

Plagiarism Question 8

You're writing your dissertation and remember writing an essay on a similar topic in first year which was awarded a good grade. You look through the old essay and pick out a couple of good paragraphs to reuse and copy them into your new document. Is this plagiarism?

☒ Yes☐ No

Plagiarism Question 9

You write a long paragraph as part of an argument within your essay, using a number of different sources to back up your points. You place the citations at the very end of the paragraph and add references at the end of your work. Is this plagiarism?

☐ Yes☒ No

Plagiarism Question 10

You ask a friend to read through your essay before you submit it. They correct some grammatical errors and rewrite some of your arguments to better meet the assessment criteria. It's just a few passages and the ideas are all yours, but you think your friend's versions sound better than your original draft, so you leave in their rewrites. Is this plagiarism?

☒ Yes☐ No
