DRAFT: 3.2
September 2020

Ideological outcome
This axis ranks ideologies by the severity of the intended ideological outcome.
Substantial: The ideological outcome would result in the death or subjugation of a specific group or significant proportion of the population (e.g. a race or religion) or in the dismantling of the state or rule of law (e.g. anarchism) or the relocation of a significant proportion of the population (e.g. a race or religion) from a country or geographic area.
Moderate: The ideological outcome would result in the change of economic system or the insistence that particular section of society (e.g. race or religion) conform to certain values.
Low: The ideological outcome would result in a change to the behaviour of the population (e.g. not to use products tested on animals) or change to specific government policy (e.g. fracking).

Activity Definitions

- The matrix works by first measuring the level of Ideological Outcome of a group or individual, followed by the level of Activity in Furtherance of Ideology.
- The activity scale measures the level of activity a group or individual is associated with, in furtherance of their ideology. There are four levels of activity: Low, Moderate, Substantial, and Severe.
- Violence of any severity can be present in each level of activity, except Low activity. But it is only violence associated with, and in the furtherance of a group or individual's ideology, that is measured on the matrix.
- Community tensions will be affected increasingly as the level of activity increases. Local/regional community tensions are affected in Moderate activity, cross-regional/national community tensions are affected in Substantial activity, and national/international community tensions are affected in Severe activity.
