

The Accession of Caligula 37AD

There had been a couple, of conspiracy's against Caligula, which in turn had caused his behaviour, to become erratic. After a planned invasion of Britain, which was intended, to be some sort of public relations exercise, to show the Emperor as a competent leader, this exercise fell apart. He returned to Rome.

Then on January 17, AD41, as Caligula left the theatre, he was stabbed, by Cassius Chaerea, which resulted in his death, by Cassius Chaerea, who was a "tribune of the Praetorian guard, whom Caligula had insulted."

Death Of Nero's father. 40-41AD

Nero's father Gnaeus Domitius died in January 41AD, in Pyrgi. He died from Edema, which is fluid retention in the body tissue, mostly in the legs. Nero was his only child.

The Exile of Agrippina

While the imperial family were visiting the Rhine frontier. Caligula was convinced both his sister's, Agrippina and Livilla, were involved in a conspiracy against him, along with his deceased sister's husband, Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, even though it seemed unlikely they were. It was thought that the sisters and Lepidus, had decided that Caligula was unstable, and this could lead to an increasing threat to them. This resulted in Caligula exiling both his sisters, Agrippina and Livilla, to Pontine Islands in 37AD.
