

Student A paraphrase:

Wartick and Wood (1998 p.103) point out that governments can have a wide range of interests in companies, from supporting them in order to help the economy, to regulating them to stop them from having a negative effect on society.

Student B paraphrase:

According to Wartick and Wood (1998, p.103), governments have interests for a variety of reasons. They are both nourished and regulated by government, in order to keep the economy healthy enough to sustain the society. On the other hand, the government may also attempt to control the harms of business activity. In some countries there is a centralised economy, which the government runs.

Task 1: Recognising what makes a good paraphrase

1. Which paraphrase is better Student A or B? Why?

Task 2:

(Suggested paraphrases)

1. According to BBC News Online (2009) due to shifting circumstances the president intends to modify the assurances made during his campaign, but he will re-evaluate them and consider the nation's present needs.

Task 2:

Write a paraphrase of these texts:

1. The president has every intention of carrying out his campaign promises. However, in the light of current conditions he'll review what would be best in the interest of the country. He'll certainly take a pragmatic approach to it since conditions are changing. (BBC News Online, 2009)
2. There's been much discussion lately about the benefits of flexible working but new research, by Virgin Media Business, has identified a potential problem: apparently, just 14% of small businesses offer their employees the opportunity to work flexible hours because they simply can't afford to. This shows that however good an idea flexible working may be in theory, it will be a lot harder to achieve in practice. (Management Today, 2010)
