

Academic writing

Writing that is considered academic is of a more formal nature and is often seen in academic journals and institutions. You will come across it in scholarly journal articles and books, and it is required of you to write your essays, research papers, and dissertation in an academic style.

The writing process for academic writing is similar to the writing process for other sorts of writings; however, academic writing adheres to certain rules about the content, structure, and style of its writing. category/academic-writing

The objective of writing for academic purposes is to deliver information in a neutral manner. It is important to avoid basing arguments on the author's preconceived notions rather than the data that is being considered. Instead of just being claimed.

It is essential to prevent the appearance of bias by presenting the findings of your own study as well as the work of other researchers in a fair and truthful manner. This requires you to provide a detailed outline of your technique and be forthright about the constraints placed on your study. (Academic Language and Learning)

The more formal tone that is typical of academic writing helps to guarantee that research is presented in the same manner throughout all of the various texts, allowing for studies to be evaluated and compared with other research in an objective manner.

Due of this, it is essential to use the appropriate words in order to convey the appropriate sentiment. It is important to steer clear of informal language such as slang, contractions, clichés, and conversational phrases. Writing. 2022. Available at: <https://www.sydney.edu.au/students/writing.html> [Accessed: 7 March 2023].

