After I graduated, I looked for jobs online on Indeed, searching jobs around my area.

The job had attractive benefits like free training, free hot meals for dinner, discounts for gym membership, private pension and my goal was to get accepted as a newly qualified and get the skills and experience.

The recruitment was easy as the demand for my qualification was high and after I wrote the perfect Cv I submitted, and I got called some week and got asked to go for the interview.

After the interview, they emailed me saying I was accepted for the position. HR completed all documents and verification on DBS, and I was given a start date for training.

Every three to six months they offered me training to improve my skill and feedback on my professional development.

I stayed in the job for a year to get confident and get the required skills in that small company and then got a job in a bigger company to improve my skills.

I left the first job because I was getting bullied, but I have no regrets. As a young girl and newly qualified it is good to get more experience and more skills from various places.
